Career in brief

I graduated from the University of Copenhagen in 1998 with an MA thesis in Hispanic philology and a minor in International Studies from Aalborg University. Later the same year I was admitted as a PhD-student at the Department of History and Civilization at the European University Institute (EUI) in Florence, Italy, where in 2004 I defended my PhD thesis on the Refoundation of a national discourse on Spain after Franco. Seven months later I took up the position of Assistant Professor at Copenhagen Business School and in 2008 as Associate Professor in Spanish Cultural and Social Analysis with particular focus on Spanish Identity in Spain, Europe and Latin America.

Research profile and projects

Through involvement in various large-scale research projects I have developed a research focus on the Spanish case in comparative perspective with particular attention to defining its weaknesses and strengths. Post-Franco Spain is in many ways just another Western European country that presents many of the same characteristics as the rest of the countries of the region. Yet, due to its twentieth century history of civil war, long-lasting nationalist dictatorship, non-participation in the two World Wars and its negotiated transition to democracy, the country represents a particular development. The transition with its particular characteristics was to have profound influence on a number of features of the new democracy, such as, for example, the democracy with its electoral system, which favours a bi-party system and strong regionally based political parties, on one hand, and the relationship with the past of dictatorship and civil war, on the other.

I have researched these themes continuously over the years as they have been the object of criticism of spontaneous social demands from the Association for the Recuperation of Historical Memory created in 2000 and the so-called 15-M movement emerging in 2011, among others. Other more recent developments in Spanish society, such as the rise of the new political party Podemos or the secessionist crisis of Catalonia, also represent evidence that the foundation of the post-authoritarian democracy is being reconsidered these years; the agreements on which it rests are no longer accepted as unnegotiable elements without which the democracy and the social balances in Spanish society will break up. Democracy is now perceived to be strong enough for discussion and criticism of the founding elements essential to its coming into being. These developments mean that the legitimacy of the discourse on the Spanish nation is shifting, and these shifts have always been a focal point of my research.

One of the main proofs of the innovation in and quality of my research is the fact that I have participated in various international research projects both after invitation and after application. Between 2008 and 2013, I was part in a cross-disciplinary research project on Spanish nationalism on the left-wing funded by the Spanish Ministry of Science and Technology, hosted at the University Pablo de Olavide in Seville, and directed by Professor Antonia María Ruiz Jiménez.

In 2013 I obtained a Marie Curie mobility-grant from the EU to do research for two years at University Pablo de Olavide. The research project, which by no means is over although the scholarship has ended, centres on an investigation of the changes which has happened in the interaction between the various national and regional discourses in Spain since the transition to democracy.

Research projects
