Research applications currently being assessed:

I am in the process of building up research on the role of commercial companies (and rationalities) in the area of cybersecurity. I am planning to do this through a focus on their role in visual technologies and the ‘regimes of visibility’ in cyber. This is my focus in the NordSteva and Doc:Pro projects. I am therefore currently involved in a range of applications in the area.

Peer-Reviewing:

I have extensive peer-review experience for journals and publishing houses; an overview is available upon request.

Teaching

I have taught a broad range of courses at all levels in area studies, international relations, international political economy and research design and methods (list provided below).

Public Engagement and Research Diffusion

Public Lectures: I give around 20 public lectures every year in a variety of contexts (detailed list overview provided on request).

Media: I answer questions from journalists / the media when called upon.

Academic “Community Services”

Inside my home institution: I have a long tradition for taking up tasks and working for the community in my home institutions. In ways that remain invisible because they are not remunerated or formally acknowledged. Below I give some indications of things that I have done along these lines.

- I often take up/take over teaching, supervision, and administration tasks that for one reason or another are not handled by my colleagues. The result is that I at present have close to 1700 overtime hours in the CBS internal accounting system (that is around two years of teaching). I am happy to provide my ‘prophix’ accounting sheet if requested.
- I coordinated the research group the Global Governance cluster of ICM and now I am coordinating the Politics Research Group seminar at MPP. This is not a task that is compensated but an important one to keep the departments’ research community alive.
- Unlike (most?) academics, I work in my office. This means that I am present in the institution and continuously have contact to my colleagues.

- I have often agreed to facilitate reading and discussion groups of PhD students. During the last year: I supported a group of PhD students interested in the overlap of international relations and international law organize a young researcher workshop at the EISA. At PUC I have supported PhD students and an assistant professor in establishing a course in International Law.

Outside my home institution: The academic community does not stop at the boundaries of the home institution. Rather scholars are continuously asked to take on tasks vital to an academic community more broadly defined. These tasks are mostly not rewarded and rarely recognized as they often remain invisible in the home institutions. Below I exemplify what I have in mind with reference to some of things I have done in 2015. (This means that I am excluding many community services I engaged in in the past, including for example my role in establishing the IPS, the STAIR and the International Theory networks).

- Reference writing for colleagues/peers. In 2015 I have written 6 recommendation letters for peers applying for funding or new positions.
- Hiring and promotion committees for assistant and associate professor positions outside the own university. In 2015 I have written three opinions on promotion requests.
- Writing of endorsements for the cover of publications: In 2015 I have written two book endorsements.
- Commenting on final PhD drafts and research proposals outside my own university/own supervisees: This year I have commented on four PhDs. I am (as a consequence) facilitating a Young Researcher Workshop at the European International Studies Association in Sept.
- Attending seminars and commenting on the work of others where I am not directly involved: This I think is important for people to attend events in their own area organized by others working on adjacent topics if a community is to remain alive. I have hence attended a number of events organized at RUC, CAST, DIIS, the Academy of Science (Videnskabernes Selskab) and in Lund and Malmö although I had no assigned role and was not personally invited.
