Research profile

I am an interdisciplinary scholar working at the intersection of organization studies and urban studies, with a strong foundation in qualitative research and a commitment to advancing democratic participation in climate politics. Holding a PhD in Philosophy from Copenhagen Business School, I have published across leading journals in sociology, management, and planning.

My research investigates political organizing in diverse settings - from large-scale urban transformations to grassroots climate initiatives. I am interested in how affective dimensions such as place attachments and the mobilization of hope shape political organizing. To explore these dynamics, I draw on pragmatic sociology, urban theory, and affect studies.

Currently, I am a Postdoc and serve as Co-Principal Investigator on the Velux-funded project KLIMA-DEL, where I lead research on self-organized climate participation in collaboration with the NGO's Democracy X and The Danish Climate Movement.
